

Today Yamamay released its third Sustainability Report, covering the year 2021. It is a document that reports exclusively on the brand.

The report is structured into four macro areas—Governance, Product, People and Planet—in which Yamamay's virtuous sustainability projects are presented through precise metrics and accurate storytelling.

More specifically, each chapter deals with topics such as: design, technology, innovation, health, safety, care for the environment in general and for the sea in particular. This year, the key theme has been the protection of the oceans and their ecosystem, as they are a vital resource for the survival of every individual.

Indeed, Yamamay, as a manufacturer of swimwear, has launched several blue economy projects, starting from the responsible production and use of resources and products, today even more in line with the new needs of the textile industry, up to supporting—as main sponsor—scientific projects with an informative and educational purpose.

Many other initiatives in the social, environmental and innovation fields have seen the involvement of a variety of internal and external stakeholders.

Each project is supported by accessible data that attest to the authentic and concrete nature of the brand's commitment to ESG (Environmental, Social and Governance) issues.

"We are well aware that the development path towards a fully sustainable identity is still long and full of opportunities. We will need to be able to seize these opportunities to anticipate the future but, for our part, we cannot but be open and ready, for the common good".
